Berlinische Galerie is pleased to present the solo exhibition $3612.54 \text{ m}^3 \text{ vs } 0.05 \text{ m}^3$ by the renowned artist Monica Bonvicini. The exhibition was opened on the occasion of the Berlin Art Week in September 2017, and it is on view through February 26, 2018. The title of the show relates to the volume of the museum space occupied by the exhibition in relation to the volume of the artist’s body. Bonvicini, who is known for re-examining minimalism, conceptual art and institutional critique, took the gallery room as the first reference, and conceived the entire exhibition as an appropriation of the institution and its museological processes, commenting on the themes that she found outside its white cube—including inclusion and barriers, subjugation and freedom.

The visitors of the Berlinische Galerie enter the museum through Bonvicini’s intervention Passing (2017)—a blind scaffolding wall constructed behind the museum’s reception. The door that leads inside shuts down with a strident bang upon every visitor entering, its sound re-echoing in the other spaces of the building. It might be perceived as a rough tool to count the audience numbers, and an alert to people in the galleries every time somebody gets in or leaves. The architectural installation and its sonorous activation by individuals going through it resonate with geopolitical areas, their borders, and the movement of people and labour, prevailing and troublesome issues in the ever-increasingly enclosing world.

Political architecture in both physical and conceptual appearances is further explored through the sculptural works inside the exhibition room Waiting #1, Breathing, Belts Ball (double two) (all 2017), The Beauty You Offer Under the Electric Light (2016) and the series of Diener. A structure of stainless steel railing is a borrowed component of disciplinary micro-architecture, ubiquitous in airports, transitory stations, cash desks etc., where people masses are organised in waiting lines. The bars are bent, and a pair of handcuffs is hanging attached by a chain, creating a minimal yet haunting scenography of conflict, escape, fleeing and disobedience.

The main volume of the room is occupied by the kinetic installation Breathing. A brush made out of leather belts and acrylic hair is attached to a pneumatic system, hanging suspended from the ceiling. The title of the work refers to the movement of cylinders that pump the air from the Berlinische Galerie art storage, located in the floor level below the exhibition space, which in turn moves the brush in a programmed 9-minute cycle, making it to wipe or hit the floor and walls. The installation and its seemingly uncontrolled movement orchestrate directions that the museum visitors take in order to avoid and bypass it. The circuiting brushing can be seen as a metaphor of cleaning, the sculptural element of Breathing—as of a "broom," dealing with the debris left after the modernist purism. One recollects Tristan Tzara’s invitation of the Dada Manifesto in 1918: “We must sweep and clean. Affirm the cleanliness of the individual after the state of madness.” Joseph Beuys, his sculptures and cleaning performances of the 70’s inform the piece’s interpretational background too. Could the automated and almost unpredictably moving broom of leashes sweep away populist opinions, discriminatory policies and derogatory rule, the leftovers of the neoliberal state? $3612.54 \, m^3 \text{ vs } 0.05 \, m^3$ can be seen as Bonvicini’s complex and perspicacious response to the current sway of paranoid politics everywhere.
